I ask no person to purchase goods from me unless I can save them money, but believe me this small assertion, I am prepared to prove to the satisfaction of the most critical purchaser, and whether a dollar or a thousand dollars are to be spent, I will endeavor to give satisfaction to all. A SPECIALTY

Lord Brackenbury.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS,

Author of "Barbara's History," "Miss Carew," etc.

It has been said that Mr. Cockerton was one who had been upon the whole fortunate. Besides that he was a bit of an antiquary, inquisitive about old houses, old families, genealogies, and the like, he was also curious to see the young lady whose prospects had been so strangely blighted a few years ago. Vague rumors of her beauty, of her poverty, and of her generous motives of the last lord's marriage, had found their way sometimes from Lincolnshire to London; and when that lord's disappearance was the common talk of the town, Miss Isaacson, more than frequently to the modern. Hence it came to pass that at the time he was much interested in the affair as any person was; and, like every one else, had by-and-by grown tired of it. Upwards, however, of seven years had elapsed since the mysterious circumstances attending Lumsdale Broadwater's departure from Lincolnshire had ceased to be matters of public curiosity. Meanwhile, a new generation had arisen, and the name of Broadwater had become unfamiliar to the ears of most people. It was consequently with no little surprise that Mr. Cockerton, on the morning after his arrival in London, found himself face to face with Broadwater himself, in the person of the new Lord Brackenbury.

He was in the coffee-room, and was sitting at breakfast with his back to the door, when he heard a voice behind him say, "Cockerton, by all that's lucky!" and, looking round, saw the man whom he had last seen as Lumsdale Broadwater, and whom he had supposed to be dead, standing before him.

He was changed, of course, but not so much as to be unrecognizable. He looked older, graver, and more careworn; but he was still young, still handsome, still himself. Mr. Cockerton, who was not easily moved, felt his heart beat as he rose and grasped the hand that was held out to him.

"Broadwater!" he exclaimed, "I am glad to see you! I thought you were dead."

"I am glad you did not think me worse than that," was the reply. "Sit down, and let me order breakfast. I have a thousand things to say to you."

Mr. Cockerton sat down, and Broadwater rang the bell and ordered breakfast. Then he turned to his guest, and said, with a smile, "I suppose you have heard of my change of fortune?"

"I have heard of your succession to the title," was the reply; "but I have heard nothing else."

"Then you have heard nothing to my discredit?"

"Nothing whatever."

"Thank you for that," said Broadwater, with a sigh of relief. "I have been very unfortunate, but I have not been to blame. Before I tell you my story, however, I must ask you to do me a favor. I must ask you to keep my secret."

"Your secret?" repeated Mr. Cockerton, in surprise.

"Yes, my secret. I am not Lord Brackenbury, and I do not intend to be. I am Lumsdale Broadwater still, and I mean to remain so."

"But, my dear fellow, you cannot help yourself. You are the heir-at-law, and you have succeeded to the title and estates. You are bound in honor to assume your proper position."

"I am bound in honor to do nothing of the kind," was the reply. "I have my reasons for what I do, and I am prepared to abide by the consequences. I am not Lord Brackenbury, and I will not be Lord Brackenbury. I am Lumsdale Broadwater, and I will remain Lumsdale Broadwater. I have said my say, and I will not say another word on the subject. Now tell me about yourself. Are you married?"

"Yes, I am married, and have a family of three children."

"Then you have done well for yourself, and I am glad to hear it. Is your wife with you?"

"No, she is at home with the children. She is not very strong, and I thought it better to leave her in the country."

"Quite right. Is she pretty?"

"I think so."

"Is she fond of you?"

"I believe she is."

"Then I envy you. Is she clever?"

"Yes, she is very clever."

"Then she is perfection. Is she rich?"

"No, she is not rich."

"Then she is perfection. Is she rich?"

"Yes, she is rich."

"Then she is perfection. Is she rich?"

"Yes, she is rich."

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1880.

Dennis Mc. Mowatt's chances in Kemble, Hon. Mr. Hagart will act as Attorney-General, Mr. Pardee being first minister pro tem.

The Queen's birthday will be observed throughout with unusual eclat. The programme will consist of grand military review, cantonal sports, with a pyrotechnic display and banquet in the evening. The Governor General and his brother, and Princess Louise will be present.

The executive committee of the Dominion Grange met at Toronto last week. The Secretary has been instructed to gather information from all parts as to the state of the crops, and quantities of grass sown, etc. The Minister of Agriculture does a great deal to the best money on the influence of forests on wind, and snow. The Secretary's report showed the Order to be in a flourishing condition.

The railway companies whose lines run into New York, have found it necessary to issue a general order forbidding fluctuations between tenk-cents and one-dollar tickets, and the lady passengers. So many elopements have recently occurred, resulting in the ruin of many a fair reputation and peaceful mind, that the matter is becoming a public disgrace and the step a necessity. True, the supposition of these pleasant flirtations may decrease the receipts of the road for a time, but none regret must be paid to the public morality.

The announcement that has been made that the Grand Trunk Railway is at last on a fair way to pay a dividend to its stock-holders, has come as a pleasant surprise to nearly every one. The receipts for the first quarter of the present year show a surplus of $56,000 over the corresponding period of last year, and the President of the Company states that from present appearances at no distant date the road will pay a full dividend upon its stock. As a consequence, the securities of the Company have shown a great increase during the past six months of at $2,000,000. The present favorable outlook is principally due to economy in the general management of the road, and to the revival in business generally in the country and the Western States, and the consequent improvement in rates. The interests of the Dominion are so closely allied with the interests of the Company that the improvement in its prospects will be hailed as a national advantage.

Although the Province of Ontario is said to have the most efficient, though probably the most expensive, educational system on the continent, a system that has been the admiration of eminent educationists from far and near, those engaged in the direction of our educational institutions never tire of experimenting with innovations. In fact, the various systems of teaching the young of the land to most appear to be about as variable, and in some instances as unreliable, as the theories of an old-fashioned farmer. The idea has lately been introduced that the hours of study are entirely too long, and the half-time system is gaining favor, and the town of Galt has, we understand, actually adopted it. The plan is to have the divisions from senior third to junior fourth as at present, but those below are to be divided into two drafts, one of which will study from 9 to 10-30, and then pass to the play room, when the other comes in to 12 o'clock, and similarly in the afternoon. One thing in favor of the half-time system is that it will probably enable the School Boards to decrease the staff of teachers, and therefore reduce the costs of the school. This advantage, however, is at least doubtful.

The carrying of concealed weapons is always dangerous, and in a country noted for the law-abiding and peaceful character of its citizens, the custom is only practised by cowards and bullies, or those who have too little sense to perceive the danger they may refer to others as well as themselves. During the past few weeks the country has been startled and grieved at the death of two personally deposed and useful citizens, as a direct result of this practice. In neither of these cases did the parties who used their weapons with such dreadful effect, require them for self defence or the protection of their property. It, in the heat of passion, or an unguarded moment, they took away a life that in two minutes afterwards either of the men would have probably cheerfully give his own to restore, to their pardoned neither they nor the law, and probably will have to expiate on the gallows. That these murders would have been committed had not pistols been in the possession of hand, is not at all likely. It is therefore high time that some more efficient restrictive measures were taken against the practice of carrying concealed weapons. The Dominion Parliament would be no compensation for the loss sustained by the country through the untimely removal of a valuable life. While the Legislature is engaged in framing a measure likely to remedy the evil complained of, it is to be hoped that it will not be long before it is passed by law to enforce the adoption of some comprehensive measure for the prevention of the promiscuous carrying of concealed arms.

A Sudden Victory for the Grange Chairman—Country Given up to Youth and Beauty.

Washington, D. C., May 18.—The Manitoba Boundary bond case is over at last, and Dominion has won all along the line, and the United States soldier may now put up his sticker to be ready for another job and now and for all time. The case was first called with a bang, Secretary Evarts, the embodiment of dignity, and Mr. Foster, counsel, bore somewhat heavy, and pull back to the place of seeing. The Secretary of the side of the bond debt which Manitoba was in default of Courtney's commissioner Mr. Chamberlain, of London, but which was subsequently withheld by the donor on the ground that there was no case. At last old Hanlan and Courtney rowed up the river, loudly cheered by the enormous crowds on either side of the river, and drew up into line for

THE RACE.

They were followed by Riley, who, when he found that Courtney meant to start, pulled down the river as if making for his boat house, and, as soon was discovered, Ward and Hanlon, the respective judges for Hanlan and Courtney, sailed the turn. As usual, Hanlan's judge was the lucky one, and chose the Virginia side of the river, while Hanlon took it straight up at the referee and observed a contingent as unconcernedly as though it were instead of six thousand dollars. He was all that was at stake on the race; while Courtney wore a nervous, broad look, as though Mr. Blackie had been reading his death warrant. Then came the word very deliberately, "Are you ready?" and after a short pause, "Go." Both men sent the water very prettily, Hanlan pulling thirty-six and Courtney about thirty four. By virtue of his position at the start Courtney led for the first few strokes but the Canadian was overhauling him at every stroke. The race looked for a few boats' lengths as though it might be a good one, for the big man was striving hard, but the clean sweeping strokes that have so often carried the Canadian champion to victory were swiftly bearing him to the front. In less than 150 yards from the starting flags he had caught up with Courtney at once, and was showing the power of his shell in the van. It now looked to the spectated as though the contest was a close one, and the shouts from the crowds on the land shore and filled the air as the men float of small boats outside the flags were absolutely deafening. "Give it to him, Charley!" and "Go in, Ned; don't yes get him!" rang from a thousand throats at the slender shells were cutting their way through the water. Hanlan rapidly did Hanlan draw to the front that it was soon apparent that her accidents he could not be the loser. He soon covered his stroke to twenty-eight to the minute, and still he drew away out in front, though at one time he ran so close on a flag that his friends feared that he might go overboard. By the time they had gone a quarter of a mile his race was practically over, but still Courtney struggled on as at seven lengths in the rear. The shouts from the crowd now began to change, the friends of the Canadian champion was appearing unable to realize that his medal he beaten so easily. "What's the matter, Charlie?" "Why don't you give it to her?" they would shout as they saw Hanlan pulling leisurely seven and twenty-eight to the minute and still drawing away from his rival. By the time the contestants had passed the Anacostan boat house, nearly a mile from the start, Courtney had evidently given up all hope of winning, and Hanlan, who was now a dozen lengths ahead, stopped to wipe his face, and then pulled slowly up while Courtney, after taking a look over his shoulder at his competitor, laid on his oars and, dipping it in the water bathed his head with it. He then pulled on at 28 to the minute, Hanlan pulling the same stroke, and steadily widening the gap between the two boats. Courtney, the position held by the Canadian champion.

A Song of Hope.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.

Why are tears so many
In this world of care?
Why are sighs so heavy,
Making low the breast,

Nay, then C'ristian brethren,
Will you still rebel?
Is it the result o'sighs?
All will still be well.

Up, and shout with spirit!
God's eyes are not dim,
And His children's sorrows
All are known to Him.

He delights to gladden—
Sing His promise out—
With His cares, needs showing
Blessings round about.

Only this weak nature
Bears not much of mirth,
So His single sorrow
In the joys of earth.

Talk to death we slumber
And return to dust,
All the gifts He sends us
Are but lent in trust.

Make not such commotion
For the things of time,
There are treasures yonder
Worthy to be thine.

Are we not from a number
Picked from many to light,
Nearer He long parents
Lastech but a night.

Night will soon be over,
Day comes on apace,
Ever can sadness
We know run our race.

Let us, then, be patient,
Bearing each his cross,
Helping till the days tread
And we reach our goal.

Then we all be sorry,
Then we shall be glad,
Then a song of triumph
Through eternity.

A WAIF'S FORTUNES.

CHAPTER IX.

"Now, continued Old Oliver, "Pascal, understand, that I dissolve an affair of honor. I order stands my enemy—he who has thrown me the—he who perhaps presents to me a source of affections are fixed upon a target at a less at present at the mercy of the wound. Do—throw me Paris."

At the word from the Frenchman, who had taken the pistols from Pearl, wheeled on his into position. At the word "Fire!" he pulled the trigger; but, unhappily for his dramatic elevation, the cartridge was a bad one, and the weapon missed fire. Pearl's really excited countenance was the result he was accustomed, and she bored only as a lovely pout of mocking disdain; and a burst smile flickered at the corner of the Count's compressed lips.

The antagonists at last stood [illegible], eagerly.

"I shall try to extract it before you pull off those delicate gloves, Pascal," I will never pay my little debts, and I will, talking the pistol from him, and pointing it at his mark. Strange to say, at the moment when the trigger was pulled, and the bullet struck the target about three inches from the bulls-eye.

"I am not a practiced, commented the [illegible] artist, with an air of mortification, continuing to the whole Monsieur d'Orsay were of the passenger's gaze, and, rolling them to a ball, threw them upon a garden seat.

"Now, monsieur, I will make a bet, Mademoiselle Pearl, that I do [illegible] next shot."

"So good a mark man it could give odds," [illegible] Pascal, and the Frenchman [illegible].

"Done! I am [illegible] to be decimal.

With a smile [illegible] through, [illegible] to resume the revolver; but, just ere the left hand sped upon its errand, a black cat sprang, to the top of the wall, from the grounds below, and, immediately above the target. The unexpected apparition was not sufficient slightly to disturb, although not to arrest, the shot, and the leaden messenger went two inches wide of its mark.

"Confusion!" exclaimed the unlucky marksman. "I am unlucky, monsieur. I will [illegible] to-morrow, or English pistols, and I [illegible] shot, to a hair's breadth."

"I am too poor to risk a scrutch, Monsieur, I do not wish to [illegible] more."

"As an arbiter, who has not courage to handle a pistol, suggests a strange confusion of ideas, said d'Orsay, with tantalizing and malicious emphasis.

Brandon's response was a stand smile. "I will carry one shot, if you dare hazard [illegible] gloves as a mark."

"How? Pinned to the wall? I think we may venture, Mademoiselle Perle." And d'Orsay picked up the little round ball.

"No; that would be being rather [illegible]. Hand the ball to Miss Solomon, and let her, standing [illegible] paces off, throw it in the air, to shoot twice the height of the garden wall."

"You will shoot her!" cried the Frenchman, after a pause of astonishment at the proposition.

"I have trust her not to do so," said Pearl. "Are you ready, Mr. Forsyth?"

A flash, a report, and the ball fell to the ground. Old man, with a [illegible] ends, stepped forward to examine it. But the smile gave place to incredulous astonishment. The ball was riddled through and through—completely spoiled. Pearl clapped her hands with delight. "You should be grateful Mr. Forsyth was magnanimous enough to decline [illegible]," said she; and Monsieur d'Orsay's scowling gratitude was not pleasant to behold.

"There is the black cat again—the wretch that killed my canary, a week ago. Oh, kill it, kill it, Mr. Forsyth!"

Brandon fired, and the cat disappeared with a bound.

"You missed it!" cried the Frenchman, joyfully.

"Possibly," said the marksman.

Monsieur d'Oliver ran to the wall, and, after one or two ineffectual efforts, succeeded in holding on to the top with the tips of his fingers. A few wrenches, contortions, and contortions, and he contrived to raise himself high enough to look over. At the same instant, while both hands were occupied in assisting himself from falling, his hair was seized by long bony fingers, and a torrent of blows were rained upon his left cheek.

"Kill my cat, would you? you frog-eating villain!" screamed a shrill voice, as an old woman's head and shoulders appeared for a moment to Master Solomon—"I'll have the law on you! I'll teach you to put a bullet through the poor creature's body, you jackanapes of a [illegible]."

And the claws fell thick and fast on the cheeks of a foe, upon the Frenchman, thrusting himself from the wall with a vigorous effort of [illegible] and leaping, rather over upon the [illegible] inside, to the astonishment of [illegible] his assailant—in which [illegible] was completely [illegible] the [illegible] of his assailant.

"Ah! you look to work," said the [illegible]. "It will be your provision, Miss Solomon, to tend up the wounds of the vanquished, and soothe his perturbed spirit. I had better withdraw."

CHAPTER X.

Three months glided away, and still Monsieur Pompe [illegible] at Jessie Villa.
